

The line graph presents the reasons individuals have cited for relocating to the capital city over a 15-year period, starting from 2000 and ending in 2015. It appears that there are four main reasons for moving: employment, study, family/friends, and adventure.

Firstly, the number of people who move for job was the highest in 2000, about 70,000, and it slowly go up to 80,000 by 2015. For studying, it start lower than jobs, but it has become the most common reason since 2005. It keep going up and cross the line of the employment in 2005, which mean more people move for study than work. By 2015, nearly 90,000 people move for this reason.

For family and friends, the line stay more or less parallel with adventure until 2010, then these reasons start to diverge. Adventure rise sharp after 2010, going past family/friends. It's interesting how the lines of family/friends and adventure intersect in 2010, before this, they were quite close together.

In conclusion, the graph show a change in why people move to the capital. While jobs and study are still important, adventure has become a much more common reason by 2015. This maybe show that people are looking more for experiences than before.
